Rec. Department Busy Making Ice at Skating Rink

After several months of a few faithfuls coming to the recreation board meeting and departing without holding one, a quorum was present last Thursday evening. The meeting consisted chiefly in listening to the report of activities from recreation director Ed Kelly.

The big project for Ed Kelly these days is "making ice" for the skating rink. The milder daytime temperatures make this more of a problem than appears on the surface. This calls for chilly night work and patient watchfulness. A rink is composed of several layers of frozen water, and each layer must be poured at the proper time.

of four youths, William Harper, William Archer, Richard Montoy and James Adams worked several weeks under the direction of Al Turner of Buena Vista, a member of the Reformatory staff. And so the "old James House" is no more. Not completely so, however, since some of the doors and intricate woodwork were saved by Poppy Smith for possible future use.

Many of Leadville's newer residents probably wonder just who James was. William H. James, born in Wales in 1838, was indeed one of Leadville's pioneers and played a large part in its early development. Coming to the United States at the tender age of 8, James resided for a period in New York before moving to Iowa in 1855. It was here that he learned the watchmaking trade and married. The lure of the Pike's Peak gold-rush was too much for James and in 1860 he and his wife migrated to Colorado. Adversity followed for a number of years. During one interval he operated a stamp mill in Nevada Gulch for two years with a total profit of $13.85, and his wife were reduced gathering greens from the hills for food and he even resorted to selling the white shirts which his mother had sent to him.

Things became brighter a little later for the James' family when he became a mine superintendent in Georgetown and in the head of the Gulch mine in Fairplay in 1873. Two years later James moved his family to Leadville when he was appointed manager of the Oro City Mining Ditch and Flume Co. He was also manager of the Printer's mine and in 1876 elected a member of the constitutional convention from Lake and Park counties. In 1878 the fortunes of James family definitely changed when he became associated with an old friend, Edward Eddy, and established the Eddy and James Sampling Works. This firm merged two years later with the Grant Smelting Co. James had an interest in the Robert Lee mine. In 1879 James succeeded Horace Tabor as mayor of Leadville and was confronted with all of the problems of Colorado's fastest growing city and the most noted mining camp in the world. Problems such as police protection, garbage collection, surveying and naming streets and alleys and many other headaches were met and solved. James and his administrative William James was the first mayor of Leadville after it became a second class incorporated city and as such is many times called Leadville's first mayor, altho Tabor rightfully has the honor. Incorporation came on April 1, 1879. James street named after him. James also was involved in the famous Miners' Strike of 1880 when he was named a Brigadier General state militia. He was appointed June 13 and served until the conclusion of martial law June 26.
